From the Pastor

*...after [Jesus] had dismissed the crowds,
he went up the mountain by himself to pray.
When evening came, he was there alone...*

Matthew 14:23

Grace to you all, and peace, in the name of our risen Lord, Jesus Christ--

I got home last night (this morning?) at 2:30 am from the Presbyterian CREDO conference for recently ordained pastors. I use the term "conference" loosely here, because CREDO was one part conference, one part retreat, and one part summer camp for pastors. CREDO is designed to help pastors at different points in their careers find balance and wholeness in five areas of life: physical, mental/emotional, spiritual, vocational, and financial.

The word "credo" is Latin for "I believe." But in a deeper sense, it means, "I give my heart." The "goal" of this conference, if there is such a thing, was the creation of a personal Rule of Life that will help keep us centered in and connected to God as we seek to give not just our hearts, but our whole lives to him, in service to the Church. Throughout the week, but especially on the last night of worship, as we shared our Rules of Life in part or whole, certain themes emerged in this group of twenty-nine pastors who are men and women doing all sorts of ministry, from north, south, east, and west, and even from other countries.

What stood out the most to me-- and it certainly informed my own Rule of Life-- is that we are people who seek to share, in word, deed, and sacrament, God's grace that is unearned and undeserved, and God's love that is unconditional. And yet almost every one of us struggles to show that same grace and unconditional love to ourselves. This may come as a shock (although it also may not), but we pastors are a neurotic, compulsive bunch of people! At CREDO, I met young pastor-types who, even though they've only been doing ordained ministry for 5 or fewer years, have been chewed up and spit out, emotionally, mentally, and spiritually broken by the churches they've served, but who are still seeking to give their hearts and their lives in service to God and the church, willing to have their hearts broken again and again.

And let me be completely honest here, this is heart-breaking work. Pastors are called to walk with people (in many congregations, hundreds of people) through all the seasons of their lives, bearing their pain, anger, fear, anxiety, as well as bearing for them the promise that they are beloved children of God, and that nothing in life or in death can ever separate them from the love of God. This is hard, demanding, exhausting work, but it's also holy work, and I wouldn't trade it for anything.

But it does take its toll on the minds, hearts, and souls of the people called to it. Which is why CREDO was so wonderfully rejuvenating. We pastor-types spend so much time and energy caring for other people, but so often neglect our own self-care. Because most of the 29 of us at CREDO flew to Louisiana, the faculty kept using the image of that mask that will drop from the ceiling of the aircraft if the cabin de-pressurizes. Confession time: I'm usually immersed in a book or listening to music while the flight attendants give the safety instructions. But what they say there is that you should get your own mask on before helping your neighbor with theirs.

That's what CREDO was about, and that's what our Rules of Life are about: making sure that we stay connected to the source of life so that we can better serve God and the communities to which we've been called. Throughout the Gospels, we frequently see Jesus retreat to a solitary place to pray; to care for his own spirit after ministering to large groups of people. This is what I've tried to build into my Rule of Life: a decrease in "busy-ness," and a healthy balance between meaningful work and self-care. Over these summer months, I pray that you, too, will find ways to care for your own soul; to put on your own mask and make sure that you are connected to the source of life.

Shalom, y'all!

Andy

Active Life Sunday

Sunday, June 28, has been designated by the PC(USA) as the first "Active Life Sunday!" This is an initiative that grew out of the mission of Team Sweaty Sheep (a non-traditional community ministry I worked with in Louisville), that seeks to encourage, inspire, and resource congregations and communities to get healthy. In a press release, my friend and colleague, Rev. Alex Becker, said of Active Life Sunday, "we hope to see churches that really care about how physically healthy their neighbors are; churches that love to play together and go out into the community to play; churches that are radically inclusive of people with all kinds of bodies; churches that can't sit still in their community and have to get the whole Body of Christ moving; churches where fellow Christians aren't treated like brains on a stick, but as people whose lives, souls, and even bodies are gifts from God." I hope that we can dream together of how we might use our whole lives-- hearts, minds, spirits, and bodies-- to serve and worship our Creator.
